

Is your communication style holding you back?

Work is a social process. It entails being in relationships with others. And the quality and caliber of your interpersonal relations is proportionate to your capacity to connect with and communicate with your colleagues, clients and others

CRYSTAL CAMPBELL,
ACPC, PCC

July 18, 2014
11:40 AM EDT

Filed under Executive Careers

Comment

Facebook

Twitter

Email

More

How aware are you of your communication style? Do you tend to talk over people? Or do you listen intently before speaking? Perhaps you're the first to reply no matter what the topic.

Whether or not you're conscious of your particular pattern, make no mistake; your communication preferences come through. Those around you can likely cite how and when you're apt to express your views. People who spend time with you can probably predict your tone, volume and the speed in which you'll communicate. They can most likely forecast if you will typically stay silent or rush to speak up. They can even project the circumstances in which you are most prone to share your thoughts, views and, let's face it, your perception of truth.

How you communicate not only speaks volumes about your personality, it also affects your career success and sense of fulfillment. That's because work is a social process. It entails being in relationships with others. And the quality and caliber of your interpersonal relations is proportionate to your capacity to connect with and communicate with others.

In my coaching practice I've witnessed how clients who understand their unique slant and the three types of communication messages (i.e., verbal, paraverbal, and non-verbal), can build consistently greater trust and influence others positively. Knowing how they're coming across gives them the chance to review the impact they're having and consider if they want to make adjustments.

your communication style and how you show up in your everyday exchanges. Just like periodically reviewing your closet to see if your clothes are stuck in the 90s (or any other decade), think about if your modus operandi would benefit from an audit. Maybe even a makeover.

Having a certified coach or other professional administer and debrief a questionnaire, then help you determine your next steps, can be time well spent. The insights you gain can change your ability to send messages, as well as your career trajectory and contentment level.

Crystal Campbell, PCC leads c2 coaching + consulting, a career and leadership development firm that helps spark smart career shifts and sustainable leadership changes in professionals, executives and teams. She is a seasoned executive with over 20 years of experience in communications and large-scale change management. Connect with her at crystal@c2coaching.ca.

Comments
Share your thoughts

---

---

CAREERS

We get that it's Monday, but you still can't %#!:@# at the office

How those on the autism spectrum can add to your company

Fiduciary officers owe duty to the company, not their wallets

How not to be an oblivious foreigner on an overseas business trip

---

What's your work type — Obliger, Upholder, Rebel or Questioner?